Dancing with the corner flag

WHEN DOES a sport cross the line of entertainment and into the realms of unsporting behaviour?

For me the answer is quite clear - anything which causes enjoyment for one set of fans, and of course players, without deliberately provoking the others is pure entertainment, anything else isn't.

Fair enough, nothing too controversial in that - and, heaven knows, that anyone who reads my editorials knows that I'm NOT the controversial sort

BUT - I've just read the latest from FIFA - and they're at it again.

I'm fed up to the eyeballs seeing Aussie players getting booked for crossing the bye line to celebrate scoring. I know that it is a FIFA edict and is meant to stop any crowd trouble but, really, all that the players are doing is running to their own fans.

And if it is good enough for Australian football then why can't the same spoil-sport rule apply to the English and Italian games as well. Anyone who watches those leagues on TV will tell you that you could do a cartwheel behind the goal at White Hart Lane or the San Siro and get away with it.

So what about the now-famous corner flag samba or field-train that some teams have turned into mini works of art? These pieces probably get as much attention at practice as corners and other set pieces do - and some of them are really brilliant.

And they are fun - for everyone. I always thought that it was a bit of FIFA double dealing that a player could get booked for running over the line but nothing happens if he dances with the corner flag.

Well, now FIFA are turning their attention to that as well, although they are leaving it up to the referee's discretion. Come on, Smurfs of Zurich - you tie the refs up inside out in red tape and rules, take away any real discretion they have and now you are copping out of it by tossing it back in their faces. And just to make it even harder for them to gain experience FIFA has announced the official reduction of entry to the FIFA list to the age of thirty nine.

THIRTY NINE - what kind of experience is anyone going to have by that age?

Maybe the time isn't that far off that someone is going to take the world governing body to the Court of Human Rights for discrimination against age.

And if that sounds stupid what about Marc Bosman - that has really sorted out our ancient and stupid anti-social transfer strangulation rules.

Me, I love it when a striker smashes the ball into the back of the net and runs past the goal line with his arms outstretched.

But then I also love the trains and flag dances.

Maybe I'm just one of those trouble makers who only goes along to a match for a bit of fun - and we all know that that won't do.

I suppose that we can all hope that the referees really do use their discretion, that seems to be our only glimmer.

Forget the maths

SOUTH MELBOURNE skipper Paul Trimboli (pictured right) says that it is time to stop talking about the mathematical possibilities of grabbing a Top Six place – and to start winning points.

"That's right," says the ball player.

"It's no good talking about what we can do if we don't do it.

"There are enough points available for us to get into the finals but first we have to win them.

"To do that we have to play well enough on a regular basis – if we don't, then we just won't make it."

That ominous message is even more apparent in view of tonight's opponents, Morwell Falcons, a side which Trimboli has enormous respect for.

Since the Latrobe side came into the big league they have almost developed a 'derby' relationship with South Melbourne and games have often been fought to the bitter end.

"They are always tough opponents," Paul says, "and that couple of wins they got will have shot their confidence up again.

"In the past the games have been very tough and tonight it is sure to be an even money bet once again."

While the skipper paints a realistic picture on the task ahead, he doesn't have any quick fix solution.

"Honestly, if there was one we would have worked it all out by now," he says.

"We have played a bit of Jekyll and Hyde soccer this year – maybe it's our inexperience, maybe it's our inconsistency.

"I don't really know what the answer is but we have to impress ourselves before we can start putting together a sequence of wins because if we don't then we will only go backwards.

"I'm sure that there are hundreds of 'experts' out there who know better than us, but we'll just have to do it the hard way."

This year the club has drafted in almost an entirely new squad, building for the future.

Paul Trimboli sees that as the future of the club, especially if the young stars are around long enough to develop together.

"Look at Steve Panopoulos," he says.

"Most people think he is a lot older than what he is because he has been around so long.

"But he is still a youngster and I consider him to be one of our best players this season.

"Blatsis, Alsopp and Baser are all new to me this year but they have done really well and look to have great futures.

"Tansell Baser came out of our youth team but I really didn't get a chance to see much of him last year so he is as new to me as the others.

"But they have the kind of potential which will serve the club well.

"Then just look at Mike Petkovic - he has been a revelation in goals.

"I know that it has been hard on Dean Anastasiadis sitting it out but Deano has the right attitude and is training hard waiting for his chance again."

That sort of attitude typifies the current squad and if they can get it together, and play with consistency, then they could well start the kind of roll which will take them into the Top Six.

And Paul Trimboli would be happy if everyone put away their calculators - starting with a win tonight.

SOCCER is often a controversial game. Maybe it's the competitive nature of the sport that sees it hit the headlines but whatever the reason it seems that no sooner has one issue been dealt with than there is another hot potato being tossed about.

The latest is the amount of 'overtime' that players are being currently put through with five, eight, ten or even twelve minutes of injury time being common.

Maybe 'stoppage' time is also a more correct term but whatever name you use what it means for the players is that they have to bring their fitness level up to another mark just to cope.

Often, extra, or stoppage time favours a more experienced team and how many times have we seen a team of old veterans claw their way back from the death in the dying stages.

Maybe it's time to turn on the clock

There is no question of South Melbourne not being fit enough to last the full '100 minutes' - because the back room staff has been astute enough to take care of that possibility.

But with so many younger players there is another question, that of concentration.

Maybe, also there is the uncertainty of not knowing when the clock is going to stop.

Other sports have different solutions with Aussie Rules using the stop clock method.

"We don't allow clocks to be used on scoreboards in the Ericsson Cup," says ASF official, Vicki Juric.

"The rules just don't permit that at all."

And in fact the ASF has gone as far as to tell one club to turn its public scoreboard clock off.

But West Adelaide coach Raul Blanco has hit back with a suggestion which might be a sensible compromise - and ease the tension with fans and players alike.

It seems that in South America the referees give an indication, by holding up fingers, of how many minutes they are adding to the game when a stoppage occurs.

That would take away a lot of the doubt.

It would also allow players to pace themselves a little better when the game enters its closing stages.

Maybe it would also take away constant suggestions that some referees are favouring particular teams.

That has always been a complaint by fans but it is unlikely in this modern age of video playbacks that there is any substance to that other than looking for a scapegoat.

Maybe the signalling of extra time would also allow players to maintain their concentration and for young teams like South Melbourne not to get hit with sucker blows to more experienced rivals.

But maybe the easiest way is just to install the Rules style scoreboard clocks.

After all, why re-invent the wheel. Their system clearly works while ours clearly doesn't.

Maybe it's time, pardon the pun, to take a leaf out of another sporting book.

Ask the South players - there wouldn't be much argument from them.

Daniel Alsopp

has done everything that was asked of him since he came into the side. The 17-year-old former VIS striker has a huge future in the game and is being freely tipped as South Melbourne's first million dollar transfer in a couple of years time.
